July 2013 AAUP Summer Institute

July 25, 2013
Annual Legal Update¹

Aaron Nisenson
Senior Counsel
American Association of University Professors

I. Introduction ........................................................................................................................................... 1

II. First Amendment and Speech Rights for Faculty and other Academic Professionals ...................... 2

   A. Speech Related to University Governance or Administrative Matters............................................. 2

   LEXIS 14363 (N.D. Ill. 2011). ................................................................................................................ 2

   (9th Cir. Nov. 7, 2012). ....................................................................................................................... 3

   Turkish Coalition of America, Inc. v. Bruininks, 678 F.3d 617 (8th Cir. 2012). ................................. 3

   B. Extramural Speech .............................................................................................................................. 4

   Van Heerden v. Bd. of Sup. of Louisiana State University, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121414 (M.D. La.
   2011). ............................................................................................................................................... 4

   C. Other Recent First Amendment Cases .............................................................................................. 5

¹This outline is an illustrative, not exhaustive, list of higher education cases of interest to this audience that have come out over approximately the past twelve months. It is intended to provide general information, not binding legal guidance. If you have a legal inquiry, you should consult an attorney in your state who can advise you on your specific situation.

Dixon v. University of Toledo, 702 F.3d 269 (6th Cir. 2012)................................................................. 6

D. Recent Supreme Court Decisions on Gay Marriage ...................................................................... 7

United States v. Windsor, 520 U.S. ____ (2013) ................................................................................. 7

Hollingsworth v. Perry, 520 U.S. ____ (2013) ................................................................................... 8

III. FOIA/Subpoenas and Academic Freedom .................................................................................. 9

The American Tradition Institute and Honorable Delegate Robert Marshall v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia & Michael Mann, Va. Cir. Case No.: CL-11-3236 (Circuit Court, Prince William County). ................................................................................................................................. 9

In re Dolours Price, 685 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012) and United States v. Trustees of Boston College (In re: Price), 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 11016 (1st Cir. 2013) ................................................................................. 10

Sussex Commons v. Rutgers, 210 N.J. 531 (2012) .............................................................................. 12

IV. Tenure, Due Process, and Breach of Contract ........................................................................... 13

A. Tenure – Breach of Contract .................................................................................................. 13

Haviland v. Simmons, 45 A.3d 1246 (R.I. 2012) ........................................................................... 13

Branham v. Thomas M. Cooley Law School, 689 F.3d 558 (6th Cir. 2012) ........................................... 15

Grimmett v. University of Alaska, --- P. 3d ----, (Alaska June 28, 2013) ............................................ 16

V. Faculty and Institutional Authority and Governance ................................................................ 17

Rosenthal v. New York University, 482 Fed. App’x 609 (2d Cir. 2012) .............................................. 17

VI. Discrimination and Affirmative Action ...................................................................................... 18

A. Affirmative Action in Admissions ............................................................................................ 18

Fisher v. University of Texas, 570 US ___, 133 S. Ct. 2411 (2013) ................................................... 18

B. “Mixed Motive” Instructions and Discrimination Statutes ......................................................... 19
Nassar v. University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center, 570 U.S. ___, 133 S. Ct. 2517 (2013).

C. Supervisor Liability Under Title VII ................................................................................................. 20

Vance v. Ball State University, 520 U.S. ___, 133 S. Ct. 2434 (2013) ...................................................... 20

VII. Intellectual Property .......................................................................................................................... 21

A. Patent and Copyright Cases ................................................................................................................ 21

docketed, No. 12-14676 (11th Cir. Sept. 12, 2012)............................................................................. 21

VIII. Union/Collective Bargaining Cases and Issues .............................................................................. 25

A. NLRB Guidance/Cases of Interest ......................................................................................................... 25

Noel Canning v. NLRB, 705 F.3d 490 (2013) ......................................................................................... 25

Point Park University v. Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh/Communication Workers of America Local 38061, AFL-CIO, CLC, N.L.R.B. Case No.: 06-RC-012276 (Private Institute Faculty Organizing) ...... 26

B. Graduate Assistants Right to Organize ................................................................................................ 27

New York University v. GSOC/UAW, N.L.R.B. Case No.: 02-RC-023481; Polytechnic Institute of New York University v. International Union, United Automobile Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement
Workers of America (UAW), N.L.R.B. Case No.: 29-RC-012054. ............................................................. 27

C. Agency Fee ............................................................................................................................................. 29

Knox v. SEIU Local 1000, 132 S. Ct. 2277 (2012) ................................................................................ 29
I. Introduction

This was a tumultuous year in the field of higher education law. In June of 2013, the U.S Supreme Court issued five decisions of importance to faculty members: in Fisher (infra at pg. 16), the Court reaffirmed the legal standard applicable to affirmative action in higher education admissions; in two employment law cases, Nassar and Vance, (infra at pg. 18-19) the Court addressed the standard of proof in retaliation cases and the issue of supervisory authority; and in Windsor and Hollingsworth, (infra at pg. 7-8) the Court addressed the issue of gay marriage. Further, in June 2012, the U.S. Supreme Court signaled that the current agency fee system may be subject to challenge (Knox, infra at pg. 28). Finally, there were a number of significant lower court decisions on issues including copyright law, First Amendment protections, FOIA requests and tenure contracts.

The National Labor Relations Board was quite active in reviewing academic bargaining in the private sector, though the final decisions have not been issued. In May and June of 2012, the NLRB invited extensive briefing in cases addressing two issues of vital importance to the academic community: whether faculty members are employees who are covered by the National Labor Relations Act (and can therefore unionize) or whether they are managers excluded from coverage (Point Park University, infra at pg. 24); and whether graduate student assistants are employees under the NLRA (NYU, infra at pg. 25). The Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit threw all of the potential Board decisions into doubt when it ruled that President Obama’s recess appointments were unconstitutional, which would render any decisions by the current Board invalid (Noel Canning, infra at pg. 23). This case is on appeal to the Supreme Court and the Board has continued to issue decisions, citing conflicting holdings from other circuits. Id.
II. First Amendment and Speech Rights for Faculty and other Academic Professionals

A. Speech Related to University Governance or Administrative Matters

Professor Loretta Capeheart has held a position at Northeastern Illinois University (NEIU) since September of 2002 and was awarded tenure in April of 2006. In 2007, Professor Capeheart and two students protested the presence of CIA recruiters at the university’s job fair. The two students were arrested by campus police. Capeheart then advocated on behalf of these students with administrators at the university, she sent several emails about the arrests to the campus community, and at a NEIU Faculty Council for Students Affairs meeting she criticized the university’s use of campus police against the peaceful student protesters. Shortly after these events, members of the Justice Studies Department faculty elected Capeheart to be their department chair. The NEIU Provost, however, disregarded the faculty vote and refused to appoint Capeheart to the position. (While the case was in litigation, Capeheart withdrew her demand to be appointed department chair.)

Capeheart sued the university, alleging that the Provost retaliated against her for speaking up at the faculty council meeting and for advocating on behalf of the arrested students. Relying on Garcetti, the district court ruled that Capeheart’s statements concerning military recruitment and the arrest of the students were not protected by the First Amendment.

Professor Capeheart appealed the District Court’s decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. AAUP’s submitted an amicus brief in support of Capeheart arguing that “the district court arrived at [its] distressing resolution of Professor Capeheart’s First Amendment claim by misapplying Garcetti’s “official duties” analysis and disregarding the express limits of Garcetti’s holding.”

On August 29, 2012, the Circuit Court issued a decision vacating the district court’s judgment, remanding with instructions to dismiss Capeheart’s First Amendment retaliation claims. While the court declined to reach the issue of "official duties" under Garcetti, the vacating of the lower court’s decision implies that this decision will have no precedential value. Substantively, the court noted that Capeheart had withdrawn her demand to be installed as the department chair, which would normally deprive the federal court of jurisdiction. The court determined that Capeheart’s attempt to enjoin the use of a proposed demonstration policy was “indeed too conjectural” and the court would not decide on the “hypothetical harms of a hypothetical rule.” Further, the court found that Capeheart’s attempts to enjoin future retaliation was “unripe” because the past retaliation against her does not sufficiently demonstrate that she is likely to be retaliated against in the future. However, that Capeheart may bring a federal claim again if she is retaliated against in the future because of her speech. This should provide her some protection from administrative actions against her, including imposition of a punitive demonstrations policy.

Professor Demers became a faculty member at Washington State University (WSU) in 1996 and he obtained tenure in 1999. Demers taught journalism and mass communications studies at the university in the Edward R. Murrow School of Communication. Starting in 2008, Demers took issue with certain practices and policies of the School of Communication. Demers began to voice his criticism of the college and authored two publications entitled 7-Step Plan for Improving the Quality of the Edward R. Murrow School of Communication and The Ivory Tower of Babel. Demers sued the university and claimed that the university retaliated against him by lowering his rating in his annual performance evaluations and subjected him to an unwarranted internal audit in response to his open criticisms of administration decisions and because of his publications.

The district court dismissed Demers’ First Amendment claim, stating, primarily, that Demers made his comments in connection with his duties as a faculty member. Unlike most recent cases involving free speech infringement at public universities, the district court’s analysis did not center on the language from Garcetti v. Ceballos. Instead, the court applied a five part test set out by the Ninth Circuit in a series of public employee speech cases and found that Demers was not speaking as a private citizen on matters of public concern. Therefore, his speech was not protected by the First Amendment.

Demers appealed the district court’s decision to the Ninth Circuit, and AAUP and Thomas Jefferson Center filed an amicus brief, arguing that Demers’ speech was related to his scholarship and other academic concerns. The brief expresses the concern that if the district court’s decision is allowed to stand, “it would have a chilling effect on research, innovation, and discourse within a public university – a place whose primary purpose is the development of knowledge through discussion, debate and inquiry.” Oral arguments were heard on November 7, 2012, and we are awaiting the court’s decision.

Turkish Coalition of America, Inc. v. Bruininks, 678 F.3d 617 (8th Cir. 2012).

In February 2012, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled that the University of Minnesota (the University) did not violate the First Amendment rights of the Turkish Coalition of America (the Turkish Coalition) by labeling its website “unreliable” for the purposes of student research.
A professor and director of the University’s Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies (the Center) produced a list of “Unreliable Websites,” which was published on the Center’s website. As websites contained in the list were considered to contain erroneous material, the professor recommended that students writing papers not rely on any of the listed websites and “refused to deny there would be academic consequences” if students did not heed this warning. The Turkish Coalition’s website, which purportedly denied the facts of the Armenian genocide, was included on the list of “unreliable” websites. The Turkish Coalition filed suit against the professor, the president of the University, and the University itself, alleging defamation and violations of its First Amendment rights.

The district court dismissed the Turkish Coalition’s First Amendment claims. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed the lower court’s ruling. Because the University did not block students’ access to the Turkish Coalition’s website, but instead only discouraged reliance on the website’s materials, the court ruled that the tenets of academic freedom precluded the Turkish Coalition’s First Amendment challenge. Noting an “absence of allegations that the challenged actions posed an obstacle to students’ access to the materials on the [Turkish Coalition’s] website or made those materials substantially unavailable at the university,” the court found that academic freedom protected the actions of the defendants.

B. Extramural Speech

Ivor van Heerden, a coastal geologist and hurricane researcher, began his full-time faculty service at Louisiana State University (LSU) in 1992, when he was appointed as associate professor-research. Van Heerden co-founded the LSU Hurricane Center in 2000 and was serving as its deputy director when Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast in August 2005. Following the storm, van Heerden was selected to head a group of scientists charged with investigating the causes of the extensive flooding in New Orleans. As a result of his research, van Heerden began speaking out publicly about his concerns that the US Army Corps of Engineers had failed to properly engineer the levees in New Orleans, causing a “catastrophic structural failure” which led to the city’s flooding.

In response to these comments, which they challenged, the LSU administration ordered van Heerden to stop making public statements and ultimately removed him from the group of scientists researching the New Orleans flooding. In May 2006, van Heerden published The Storm in which he outlined his theories concerning the Army Corps’ role in the levee failures and exposed LSU’s efforts at silencing him. LSU responded by further stripping him of his teaching duties and finally refused to renew his contract after nearly 20 years of employment with the university. Following the termination of his services, van Heerden sued LSU for a variety of claims including defamation, retaliation based on his protected First Amendment speech, and breach of contract.

Through a series of decisions, the federal district court for the Middle District of Louisiana dismissed many of van Heerden’s claims, but the court ruled that van Heerden could proceed with arguing that the administration’s action to terminate his appointment was in retaliation for his public comments about the culpability of the Army Corps of Engineers. It is especially important to note that the court expressed particular concern about what it viewed as the misapplication of Garcetti’s principles to academic speech. Specifically, the court stated that it “shares Justice Souter’s concern that wholesale application of the Garcetti analysis to the type of facts presented here could lead to a whittling-away of academics’ ability to delve into issues or express opinions that are unpopular, uncomfortable or unorthodox. Allowing an institution devoted to teaching and research to discipline the whole of the academy for their failure to adhere to the tenets established by university administrators will in time do much more harm than good.”

In February 2013, several days before the federal jury trial was scheduled to begin, van Heerden and LSU settled the dispute out of court. Van Heerden reportedly received $435,000 from LSU. See Bill Lodge, LSU Settles van Heerden Case for $435,000, THE ADVOCATE (Feb. 27, 2013), http://www.theadvocate.com/home/5294342-125/lsu-settles-van-hererden-case.

C. Other Recent First Amendment Cases

A state university employee's petition to rescind her university's employee-attendance policy was an employee grievance concerning internal office policy. Thus, it was not a matter of public concern upon which the employee could base a claim that she was terminated in violation of her First Amendment right to free speech. This was true although the employee submitted her petition to a state employment board and the petition was related union related.

The U.S. District Court for the Western District of New York found that an elementary school teacher’s complaint that her school district discriminates against African American students was not protected speech under the First Amendment. Noting that the teacher’s statements (i) were made during a mandatory grade-level meeting and (ii) were “related to a matter that was directly connected to, and arose out of, her duties as a teacher,” the court held that the teacher did not speak as a citizen on a matter of public concern. As a result, the teacher’s speech was not protected from discipline from the school district.
Huang v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126356 (W.D. Va. 2012).

The U.S. District Court for the Western District of Virginia determined that a University of Virginia researcher was not protected by the First Amendment guarantee of free speech when he alleged that his supervisor misappropriated public grant funds. Finding that the researcher’s allegations did not constitute a matter of public concern and that the researcher made the allegations “in the course of his official duties and in his role as an employee” of the University, the court declined to grant the researcher protection from professional retaliation under the First Amendment.

The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held that a teacher’s e-mail to the Chancellor of the D.C. public school system, which criticized the “classroom facilities, supplies, teaching assistants, and test scores” at the teacher’s school, did not constitute protected speech under the First Amendment. Questioning whether the academic freedom exception outlined in Garcetti is applicable outside of the higher education context, the court held that the exception “surely would not apply in a case involving speech that does not relate to either scholarship or material taught.” Further, citing the “form and context” in which the teacher’s complaint was made, the court ruled that the teacher’s e-mail was speech by a public employee; thus, the teacher was not protected from discipline as the result of his e-mail.

A Michigan Court of Appeals held that a public school teacher’s speech, made in the form of a report of student sexual assault to Child Protective Services, was protected by the First Amendment. Finding that (i) the speech involved a matter of public concern, (ii) the speech was not made by the teacher in her professional capacity, and (iii) “the societal interests advanced by [the] speech outweighed the [school district’s] interests in operating efficiently and effectively,” the court held that the First Amendment protected the teacher from retaliation stemming from her speech.

Dixon v. University of Toledo, 702 F.3d 269 (6th Cir. 2012).

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that an associate vice president of human resources for the University of Toledo did not engage in protected speech under the First Amendment when writing an op-ed column criticizing the gay rights movement. Specifically, the court held that, because the employee’s op-ed directly contradicted many of the university’s policies and the employee’s job involved the implementation of university policies, the university did not violate the employee’s First Amendment rights by terminating her employment as a result of the column.

The U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Louisiana found that an elementary school teacher’s objection to her principal’s implementation of an illegal grading system was protected speech under the First Amendment. The court held that the teacher’s objections to the grading system constituted “mixed speech,” which is characterized by “elements of both personal and public concern.” The court also determined that the importance of the teacher’s speech outweighed the school district’s interest in efficiency. As a result of these findings, the court denied the school district’s request for summary judgment on the teacher’s First Amendment retaliation claims.

D. Recent Supreme Court Decisions on Gay Marriage

United States v. Windsor, 520 U.S. ____ (2013)

This case involved a challenge to the Defense of Marriage Act, a federal statute that defined marriage as only between a man and a woman. The statute limited federal benefits arising from marriage, such as the marriage benefits under the tax code, to such marriages. This limitation was in place even if gay couples were legally married in a given state. The Court ruled 5 to 4, with Justice Kennedy authoring the opinion, that this law was unconstitutional because it violated the Due Process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The Court found that the statute unconstitutionally singled out for adverse treatment a class of persons even though the individual states had decided to protect and honor such marriages. As the Court noted “DOMA instructs all federal officials, and indeed all persons with whom same-sex couples interact, including their own children, that their marriage is less worthy than the marriages of others.” While this decision is an important one, the Court did not rule that gay persons had a right to be married, instead this is still a decision for individual state legislatures. Here is the concluding section of the decision.

The power the Constitution grants it also restrains. And though Congress has great authority to design laws to fit its own conception of sound national policy, it cannot deny the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

What has been explained to this point should more than suffice to establish that the principal purpose and the necessary effect of this law are to demean those persons who are in a lawful same-sex marriage. This requires the Court to hold, as it now does, that DOMA is unconstitutional as a deprivation of the liberty of the person protected by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution.

The liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause contains within it the prohibition against denying to any person the equal protection of the laws. See Bolling, 347 U. S., at 499–500; Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U. S. 200, 217–218 (1995). While the Fifth Amendment itself withdraws from Government the power to degrade or demean in the way this law does, the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment makes that Fifth Amendment right all the more specific and all the better understood and preserved.

The class to which DOMA directs its restrictions and restraints are those persons who are joined in same-sex marriages made lawful by the State. DOMA singles out a class of persons deemed by a State entitled to recognition and protection to enhance their own liberty. It imposes a disability on the class by refusing to acknowledge a status the State finds to be dignified and proper. DOMA instructs all federal officials, and indeed all persons with whom same-sex couples interact, including their own children, that their marriage is less worthy than the marriages of others. The federal statute is invalid, for no legitimate purpose overcomes the purpose and effect to disparage and to injure those whom the State, by its marriage laws, sought to protect in personhood and dignity. By seeking to displace this protection and treating those persons as living in marriages less respected than others, the federal statute is in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

Hollingsworth v. Perry, 520 U.S. ____ (2013).

This case involved a challenge to California Proposition 8, which had overturned a gay marriage statute and had outlawed gay marriage in the State of California. There was a challenge brought to Proposition 8, and the US District Court found that Proposition 8 was unconstitutional. Importantly, the State of California did not appeal the decision, instead an outside group pursued the appeal. The Supreme Court ruled that the decision of the district court could not be challenged by this outside group. Therefore, the appellate courts had no jurisdiction to hear any appeals and the district court decision was final and binding.

While this case has the political effect of legalizing gay marriage in California, the Court’s ruling was based on procedural grounds and the Court did not address the substance of whether Proposition 8 was unconstitutional. This distinction is exemplified by the differences in the Justices who made up the majority in Hollingsworth versus the Justices who ruled in the DOMA case: in particular, Justices Roberts and Scalia joined the majority in Hollingsworth but not in the DOMA case while Justices Kennedy and Sotomayor dissented in Hollingsworth. Thus while this case has important political implications, and may have a procedural impact on cases in general, it does not address the underlying issue of the constitutionality of gay marriage.

III. FOIA/Subpoenas and Academic Freedom

_The American Tradition Institute and Honorable Delegate Robert Marshall v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia & Michael Mann, Va. Cir. Case No.: CL-11-3236 (Circuit Court, Prince William County)._

In 2011, the American Tradition Institute served a FOI request on the University of Virginia regarding Professor Mann’s climate research. This request mirrored the subpoena previously served on the University by Attorney General Cuccinelli. (We previously reported on the conclusion of the _Cuccinelli v. UVA_ case which was decided by the Virginia Supreme Court.) The University supplied some records, but took the position that the majority of the records were not subject to public disclosures. Thereafter, ATI petitioned to compel the production of these documents. Professor Michael Mann sought to intervene, arguing that the emails in question were his and therefore he should have standing in any litigation relevant to any document release. AAUP submitted a letter to the 31st Judicial Circuit Court of Virginia in support of Mann’s intervention, and the court granted him standing.

AAUP and the Union of Concerned Scientists subsequently filed a joint amicus brief on July 24, 2012, in support of UVA and Professor Mann and urged that “in evaluating disclosure under FOIA, the public’s right to know must be balanced against the significant risk of chilling academic freedom that FOIA requests may pose.” The brief also argued that enforcement of broad FOIA requests that seek correspondence with other academics, as ATI sought here, “will invariably chill intellectual debate among researchers and scientists.” Also, exposing researchers’ “initial thoughts, suspicions, and hypotheses” to public scrutiny would “inhibit researchers from speaking freely with colleagues, with no discernible countervailing benefit.” The brief further argued that allowing FOIA requests “to burden a university with broad-ranging document demands based on questions concerning the scientific validity of a researcher’s work or on the potential that something might turn up would have the strong potential to ‘direct the content of university discourse toward or away from particular subjects or points of view,’ and will have a significant chilling effect on scientific and academic research and debate.”

On April 2, 2013 the Virginia Circuit Court issued a written Order ruling that faculty email correspondence related to academic research constitutes a public record under Virginia’s Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) when the faculty members are government employees on government property using government facilities for government purposes. The court held however, that all of the records sought by petitioners qualified for exclusion under the Virginia FOIA exemption for “data, records or information of a proprietary nature produced or collected by or for faculty of staff of public institutions of higher education..... in the conduct of or as a result of study or research on medical, scientific or scholarly issues, whether sponsored by the institution alone or in conjunction with a governmental body, where such data, records or information has not been publicly released, copyrighted or patented” or under the exemption for personnel records. The court also ruled that purely personal email messages are not public records under the Virginia FOIA. Although the court did not rely on the academic freedom and First Amendment issues argued by the parties, it noted that the research exception in the Virginia FOIA does arise from the concept of academic freedom and from the interest in protecting research. Petitioners have requested discretionary review by the Virginia Supreme Court.

_in re Dolours Price, 685 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012) and United States v. Trustees of Boston College (In re: Price), 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 11016 (1st Cir. 2013)._

Referred to collectively as the “Boston College Subpoena” case, this complex litigation involves two separate federal appellate court decisions involving subpoenas served on Boston College for oral-history materials held in its John J. Burns Library. In the first decision, issued in 2012, the court held that there was no absolute privilege against the disclosure of research material. However, in the second decision, issued in 2013, the court held that in order to compel disclosure, the lower courts needed to review the subpoenas and conduct a balancing test, weighing the First Amendment concerns involved in releasing the materials against the obligation to provide evidence in a criminal case.

Between 2001 and 2006, scholars at Boston College recorded detailed interviews with former loyalist and republican paramilitary members who fought in Northern Ireland; this project is known formally as the Belfast Project. In order to make the interviewees feel safe (which was necessary to get their cooperation), the researchers promised the interviewees anonymity until the interviewees’ death. The first interviews from the archive were published in the book, _Voices from the Grave_, and featured in the documentary of the same name, in 2010. These interviews, with former IRA leader Brendan Hughes and former UVF member David Ervine, were made public upon the death of these interviewees as per their agreement with Boston College. (http://bostoncollegesubpoena.wordpress.com/)

The Boston College subpoenas were issued on behalf of the British government based on the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT), which allows signing members to assist each other in international criminal investigations without going through diplomatic channels. The Boston College subpoenas are part of a criminal investigation by United Kingdom authorities into the 1972 abduction and death of Jean McConville, who was thought to have acted as an informer for the British authorities on the activities of republicans in Northern Ireland.
Boston College asked the United States District Court to quash the subpoenas as to records pertaining to the other still living interviewees on the grounds that release of the information could threaten the safety of interviewees, the continuing peace process in Northern Ireland, and the future of oral history. Boston College also argued that this type of forced disclosure could have a detrimental impact on academic freedom. In addition, the principal interviewers in the project, Ed Moloney and Anthony MacIntyre, together filed a motion to intervene in the district court case to protect the confidentiality of past and future contributors to the Belfast Project. In a December 2011 opinion, the District Court rejected Boston College’s motion to quash the subpoenas but did grant its request for an in camera review and denied the motion by Moloney and MacIntyre to intervene in the case. Moloney and MacIntyre then filed individual complaints, which the District Court dismissed.

Moloney and MacIntyre appealed to the U.S. First Circuit Court of Appeals the dismissal of their individual complaints and asserted that the compelled disclosure of the interview violated the First Amendment. On July 6, 2012, the First Circuit court upheld the dismissal of Moloney and McIntyre’s individual lawsuit. In re Dolours Price, 685 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012). The court also analyzed Moloney/McIntyre’s First Amendment claim that compelling production of the records violated their individual “constitutional right to freedom of speech, and in particular their right to impart historically important information for the benefit of the American public, without the threat of adverse government reaction.” Moloney/McIntyre asserted that production of the subpoenaed interviews is contrary to the confidentiality they promised the interviewees and they asserted an “academic research privilege” to be evaluated similarly as a reporter’s privilege. The court noted, however, that the United States Supreme Court has distinguished between “academic freedom” cases (involving government attempts to influence the content of academic speech and direct efforts by government to determine who teaches) on the one hand, from, on the other hand, the question of privilege in the academic setting to protect confidential peer review materials.

The court viewed this case as falling into the second category of cases and as such “is far attenuated from the academic freedom issue, and the claimed injury as to academic freedom is speculative.” The court relied heavily on the decision in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), in which the Supreme Court rejected a general purpose reporter’s privilege for confidential sources and held that the “government’s strong interests in law enforcement precluded the creation of a special rule granting reporters a privilege which other citizens do not enjoy.” The First Circuit pointed out that in Branzburg the court discussed the situation of reporters who promised confidentiality as well as of informants who had committed crimes and those innocent informants who had information pertinent to the investigation of crimes and found that the interests in confidentiality of both kinds of informants does not give rise to a First Amendment interest in the reporters to whom they had given the information under a promise of confidentiality. Thus, the court reasoned, “if the reporters’ interests were insufficient in Branzburg, the academic researchers’ interests necessarily are insufficient here,” and therefore Moloney and McIntyre had no First Amendment basis to challenge the subpoenas. The court remanded the case for a determination on whether the individual interviews needed to be released pursuant to the subpoena.

On May 31, 2013, the First Circuit again addressed the matter to determine whether the District Court properly compelled the release of certain interviews. United States v. Trustees of Boston College (In re: Price), 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 11016 (1st Cir. 2013). The court rejected the position of the United States that federal courts do not have discretion to review for relevance subpoenas issued pursuant to a treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom. The court declared that enforcement of subpoenas is an inherent judicial function which, by virtue of the doctrine of separation of powers, cannot be constitutionally divested from the courts of the United States. The court further applies a “direct relevance” standard to its review of the material sought by the subpoena and explained that a “balancing of First Amendment concerns vis-à-vis the concerns asserted in favor of the compelled disclosure of academic and journalistic information is the law.” Applying the balancing test the court ruled that the number of oral history interviews ordered to be produced by the District Court should be reduced from 85 to 11.

In 2005 and 2006, the Rutgers Environmental Law Clinic represented a group of New Jersey citizens opposed to a particular commercial development project. The development filed an Open Public Records Act (OPRA) request for documents related to the clinic’s operation. The university refused to provide most of the requested documents, and the development company sued to compel production under OPRA.

On October 7, 2008, the Superior Court of New Jersey ruled that the clinical programs of Rutgers School of Law are unique hybrid institutions and therefore exempt from New Jersey’s open records law. The development company appealed the decision to the Appellate Division, and AAUP joined in filing an amicus brief in support of the Rutgers University Environmental Law Clinic. The brief argued that requiring the clinic’s records to be released publicly would impinge on the academic freedom rights of Rutgers faculty and students as well as the First Amendment rights of citizens to access and use law clinics. The brief urged the court to view legal clinics as the law schools’ research laboratories where clinical instructors train their students in developing new legal theories and expanding existing legal doctrine through litigation of actual cases. It further argued that requiring law clinics to release documents related to the operation of the clinics risks forcing law clinics, and particularly clinical educators, to make case intake or other decisions for non-pedagogical reasons, thereby preventing clinics from using the best means to train students in professional skills and values. The Appellate Division, however, reversed the lower court’s decision, finding that the law clinic met the definition of a “public agency” and therefore was subject to OPRA.

Rutgers appealed to the Supreme Court of New Jersey which issued its decision on July 5, 2012, reversing the Appellate Division’s decision and holding that “records related to cases at public law school clinics are not subject to OPRA.” The court found that legal clinics do not perform any government functions – they conduct no official government business, nor assist in any aspect of State or local government. Therefore, the court reasoned, allowing public access to legal clinic case documents would not further the purposes of OPRA, inasmuch as such records “would not shed light on the operation of government or expose misconduct or wasteful government spending.” The court also agreed with Rutgers and amici that the “consequences [of applying OPRA to public legal clinics] are likely to harm the operation of public law clinics, and by extension, the legal profession and the public.”

IV. Tenure, Due Process, and Breach of Contract

A. Tenure – Breach of Contract

_Haviland v. Simmons_, 45 A.3d 1246 (R.I. 2012)

This case involved a university’s creation of a tenure-like teaching position for the spouse of an incoming dean. A Rhode Island state court found that a legally enforceable employment contract existed between the spouse and the university, even though the terms of the contract existed only in a series of letters from various university officials (rather than in one cohesive document).

In the spring of 2000, Brown University asked Paul Armstrong to be the Dean of the College at Brown. The university offered his wife, Beverly Haviland, a position combining that of a Senior Lecturer and a Visiting Associate Professor. Instead of drawing up one cohesive contract, the university offered Haviland the job and described its scope and benefits through a series of letters. The first letters, dated October 16 and 18, 2000, stated that Haviland’s appointment would be renewed every five years except for “adequate cause.” In 2009 she was reviewed for reappointment under the department’s “sustained excellence in teaching” standard, a different standard than what had been outlined in the October letters. Although she was reappointed through 2015, Haviland believed that her reappointment should have been governed by the tenure review standards outlined in the October 2000 letters. She filed suit in the Superior Court of Rhode Island asking for a declaratory judgment to define the enforceability and terms of her employment agreement with Brown.

Initially, the court found that Haviland’s interest in her job provided adequate standing for Haviland to sue “to resolve the real uncertainty she ha[d] concerning employment security with Brown.” The court further held that, although the terms of Haviland’s agreement with Brown were not set out in a single document, “an enforceable, express employment contract” nevertheless existed between the parties. Further, finding that “the terms of the contract are contained within the several communications and letters exchanged between Brown University and Haviland,” the court noted that any ambiguity in the contract’s terms should be construed against Brown, the drafting party. As such, the court ruled that Haviland’s reappointment should be governed by the “express terms [that Brown’s agents dictated] . . . in the letter of October 18, 2000.” Finally, Brown argued that the university officers that corresponded with Haviland in finalizing her employment contract lacked both apparent and actual authority to provide Haviland with a “tenure-like status.” However, the court found that Brown failed to provide evidence establishing that these officers lacked such authority, and Brown was “precluded from denying that its administrators had the authority to provide plaintiff with employment security.”

Dr. Laurence Kant is the plaintiff-movant in this matter. Dr. Kant, who is of the Jewish faith, was an Associate Professor of the History of Religion at the Lexington Theological Seminary (LTS). LTS is affiliated with the Disciples of Christ, a denomination of the Christian faith, and does not provide classes with a secular purpose. Teaching at LTS in various capacities since 2000, LTS granted Dr. Kant tenure in March 2006. However, LTS terminated Dr. Kant’s contract at the end of the spring 2009 semester, citing financial exigency as the impetus for its decision.

Following his termination in 2009, Dr. Kant filed a complaint against LTS, “alleging that LTS had breached his contractual right to tenured employment and breached the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing.” Dr. Kant’s complaint sought both compensatory and punitive damages from LTS. Following a hearing on LTS’ motion to dismiss the case as an “ecclesiastical matter,” the district court sustained LTS’ motion and concluded that Dr. Kant was a “ministerial employee” due to the subject matter of his course load. Concluding that the ministerial exception thus applied in the case, and “that the issues in the case also involved an ecclesiastical matter,” the district court ruled that it lacked the requisite subject matter jurisdiction over the controversy.

Dr. Kant appealed the district court’s decision to the Commonwealth of Kentucky Court of Appeals, arguing that both the “ecclesiastical matters rule” and the “ministerial exception” do not apply to this controversy. Ultimately, the court of appeals affirmed the district court’s ruling that it had no subject matter jurisdiction in this case. First, the court of appeals found that LTS’ “decision making as to who will teach its students . . . would be an inquiry into an ecclesiastical matter” and that such inquiries are prohibited—except for in rare circumstances—under the so-called ecclesiastical matters rule. Second, the court of appeals agreed that the ministerial exception barred Dr. Kant’s claims because his “primary duties involved teaching religious-themed courses at a seminary . . . that prepared students for Christian ministry.” Relying heavily on the U.S. Supreme Court’s recent decision in Hosanna-Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church & School v. EEOC, 132 S. Ct. 694 (2012), the court of appeals found that Dr. Kant’s proffered cause of action (based in contract law principles) did “not trump constitutional protections and freedoms of the church.”

Dr. Kant then petitioned to the Kentucky Supreme Court for a discretionary review of the Court of Appeals decision. On or about February 18, 2013, the Supreme Court granted Dr. Kant’s petition for discretionary review of the Court of Appeals determination. The AAUP will filed an amicus brief on behalf of Dr. Kant in April 2013. The brief argued that the school was bound by the contract that it had voluntarily entered into. Further, the issue at the heart of the case -- whether LTS was permitted to eliminate tenure and terminate Dr. Kant due to a financial exigency -- is a narrowly tailored, non-religious question that will not require the Court of Appeals to intrude on or analyze matters of church doctrine or governance.

_Branham v. Thomas M. Cooley Law School, 689 F.3d 558 (6th Cir. 2012)._

Tenured law professor Lynn Branham was terminated from Thomas M. Cooley School of Law (“Cooley”) and subsequently sued the law school in federal court on claims of violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and Michigan Persons with Disabilities Civil Rights Act, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and breach of contract. The federal district court granted Cooley’s motion for summary judgment on Branham’s first three claims, but allowed her breach of contract claim to proceed. The district court went on to rule that Cooley had breached its employment contract with Branham because it failed to follow the specified procedures for dismissal and ordered Cooley to comply with that process. To comply with the Court’s order, Cooley held a faculty conference to determine whether there was good cause to dismiss Branham from her position. The faculty concurred with the decision to dismiss Branham, and the Board of Directors unanimously upheld the faculty’s decision. The district court then ruled that Cooley had fulfilled its due process obligations under the employment contract and that the process complied with Michigan law. The court then entered judgment against Branham.

Branham subsequently appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, arguing, among other things, that the district court erred in concluding that the tenure granted under her contract does not afford her rights beyond the one year term specified in her employment contract. The Sixth Circuit upheld the district court’s decision, concluding that Branham’s employment contract did not create an obligation of continuous employment, but rather expressly limited its term to one year. The Court reasoned that while Branham may have had tenure in the sense that she had academic freedom, she was due only the employment protection and process specified in her employment contract.

Branham’s attorney subsequently filed a Petition for Rehearing en Banc on September 6, 2012. AAUP filed a motion and amicus brief in support of Branham’s petition which was authored by AAUP Committee A member Matt Finkin. AAUP’s brief argued that the district court ignored the well-developed body of law in which the courts have uniformly emphasized that tenure accords a continuing appointment until dismissal for cause. Additionally, the brief noted that the courts have stressed that in construing the content of academic tenure, attention has to be paid to the relationship of tenure to the protection of academic freedom. Thus, “it is permanence of appointment that protects academic freedom in a way that a sequence of annual contracts simply cannot.”

The Sixth Circuit issued an order on October 3, 2012, denying Branham’s petition for rehearing.

This case involved the termination of two University employees, Yauna Taylor, an “Administrative Generalist,” and Calvin Grimmett, a police officer. (While neither employee was a faculty member, this case is instructive as their terminations arose under the general Regents Policy and University Regulations.)

Both employees were found to have their terms of “appointment and other terms of employment governed by the Board of Regents Policy, University Regulations, and applicable campus rules and procedures.” The Regents Policy and University regulations provided that if an employee was not designated as an at will employee, then the employees could only be terminated “for cause.” Another Regents Policy allowed the University to discontinue or not renew an existing employee through “nonretention”. The University terminated both employees pursuant to the “nonretention” clause, and also alternatively terminated Grimmett for cause. The University did not provide Taylor with an opportunity to contest her termination at a heard. The University did hold a hearing on Grimmett’s termination and found that the “nonretention” was substantively valid and that there was just cause for termination.

The employees sued for violation of their due process rights and breach of contract. The employees alleged that the University had attempted to use the nonretention provision to avoid demonstrating that they had been terminated for cause. The lower court issued a decision in the employees’ favor and an appeal followed. On June 28, 2013, the Alaska Supreme Court issued a decision finding that the employees were entitled to due process prior to a performance-based dismissal, and the termination of the employees without a due process hearing was reversed and the employees were awarded back pay. The court found that the employees both held for-cause employment and that the non-retention clause could not be used for a performance-based dismissal of the employee. Further, the context of the nonretention clause suggested that the non-retention functioned in a way similar to layoff and financial exigency. Therefore non-retention, like those two procedures, was limited to reductions in force or similar non-performance-related exigencies.

V. Faculty and Institutional Authority and Governance

In this case the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, affirming a federal district court decision, reinforced the discretion and authority of faculty over clearly educational matters.

Ayal Rosenthal was a part-time MBA student at NYU’s Stern School of Business. He also worked for Pricewaterhouse Coopers, and he tipped off his brother to nonpublic securities information, which his brother used to make trades. The federal government initiated an investigation upon learning of his activities. Rosenthal pled guilty to conspiracy to commit securities fraud shortly after completing his Stern course requirements but before receiving his degree. The school decided not to grant him his degree, based in part on a recommendation from the faculty, and Rosenthal sued.

At the district court level, the court looked to the NYU ByLaws and concluded that the Bylaws “grant the Stern faculty exclusive jurisdiction and authority to determine Stern’s standards of academic achievement, confer degrees, and dismiss students. The Stern faculty’s decision to withhold Rosenthal’s degree was an exercise of the authority delegated to it” under the Bylaws.

On appeal, Rosenthal again argued that NYU had breached its implied contract with students “by failing to observe its own rules and procedures.” Relying on New York state law precedent requiring courts to defer greatly to “‘faculty’s professional judgment’ in the case of . . . ‘genuinely academic decision[s],’” the U.S. Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court’s decision. The appeals court held that it was not “arbitrary and capricious for the Stern faculty to conclude that it had the power to apply its Code of Conduct to a violation of federal criminal law to determine it would not certify Rosenthal a ‘Master of Business Administration’ after he pled guilty, while an MBA candidate and professional accountant, to insider trading.”
VI. Discrimination and Affirmative Action
A. Affirmative Action in Admissions

In this case, the U.S. Supreme Court generally upheld the constitutionally of affirmative action plans as implemented under the Court’s previous decisions. The Court generally reaffirmed its prior holdings that found that diversity in educational institutions was a compelling state interest that could necessitate the use of an affirmative action program. However, the Court returned the case to the appeals court finding that the lower court had applied the wrong standard of proof in determining whether the affirmative action plan was necessary to attain the goal of diversity.

The case arose out of the University of Texas’ admissions plan. The UT system had previously determined that diversity was essential to its educational mission. In an attempt to attain diversity, the UT system replaced an earlier admissions plan which had explicitly considered race with a “Personal Achievement Index” (PAI). The PAI is produced through a holistic review of applications intended to identify students whose achievements are not accurately reflected by their test scores and grades alone. The PAI includes an evaluation of required written essays and a “personal achievement score,” which is made up of factors such as socio-economic status, languages at home, and whether the student lives in a single-parent household. In addition, the state legislature and the university adopted a variety of other initiatives to increase diversity.

The AAUP filed an amicus brief with the Fifth Circuit in support of the UT system. Specifically, the brief focused on the benefits of a diverse student body and pointed out that the University of Texas specifically modeled its admissions policy on a similar policy endorsed by the Supreme Court. The brief also argued that academic freedom depends on the right of universities to freely choose who is admitted to their communities because universities have the educational expertise to design and fulfill their own academic missions.

Relying on the Supreme Court’s 2003 decision in Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), the Fifth Circuit ruled in favor of the university, affirming that the university has “a compelling interest in obtaining the educational benefits of diversity.” In doing so, the Fifth Circuit also held that deference should be granted to the university’s educational judgment that diversity is essential to its educational mission, and that deference should be granted to the university’s decision to use race as a factor to attain this diversity.

The case was appealed to the Supreme Court. In August 2012, the AAUP again joined in a coalition amicus brief submitted to the Supreme Court and drafted by the American Council on Education. On June 24, 2013 the Supreme Court ruled 7 to 1 to remand the case because the lower court did not apply to proper standard of proof when evaluating the claims. In particular, the Court found that the Fifth Circuit erred in granting deference to the University’s decision to use race as a factor to attain diversity. As the Court explained, the “University must prove that the means chosen by the University to attain diversity are narrowly tailored to that goal. On this point, the University receives no deference.” Slip op. at 10.

However, most importantly, the Court did NOT rule that affirmative action was inherently unconstitutional, as many had feared. Instead, the Court primarily reaffirmed its 2003 holding in Grutter, which has been the law of the land for the last 10 years. The Court also reaffirmed some of the fundamental holdings of Grutter. For example the Court reiterated that “student body diversity is a compelling state interest that can justify the use of race in university admissions.” Slip op. at 7 (Quoting Grutter at 325.) Similarly, the Court found that it was appropriate to accord universities deference on whether “such diversity is essential to its educational mission.” Slip op. at 9.

While this decision does not change the legal standard, it may embolden those challenging these policies or may prompt reconsideration of their use my some higher education institutions. Thus the decision may provide political fodder to some, but it should not significantly alter the legal standards applicable in affirmative action cases.

B. “Mixed Motive” Instructions and Discrimination Statutes

Nassar v. University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center, 570 U.S. _____, 133 S. Ct. 2517 (2013).

In this case the Supreme Court limited the standard of proof in retaliation cases to the narrower “but for” causation standard.

Naiel Nassar, M.D. served as an Assistant Professor of Internal Medicine and Associate Medical Director with the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center (UTSW) Clinic. Dr. Nassar complained that he allegedly was being harassed by a Supervisor, Dr. Levine, and sought transfer to another role that would take him out of her line of supervision. He stepped down from his faculty post when he received a job offer working for Parkland, an affiliated clinic, effective July 10, 2006. On July 3, he submitted a letter of resignation in which he asserted that his "primary reason" for resigning was because of Dr. Levine's harassing and discriminatory behavior. Shortly thereafter, Parkland withdrew its job offer.

Dr. Nassar brought suit in federal court, accusing UTSW of orchestrating Parkland's refusal to hire him in retaliation for his discrimination complaints, in violation of Title VII. The jury found that UTSW constructively discharged and retaliated against Dr. Nassar, and awarded him $ 3.4 million in back pay and compensatory damages. UTSW appealed to a three-judge panel of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, arguing among other things that Dr. Nassar failed to prove that retaliation was the “but for” cause of Parkland's decision not to hire him. Citing to its 2010 ruling in Smith v. Xerox Corp., 602 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2010), which held that the mixed-motive framework is available to Title VII retaliation plaintiffs, the Fifth Circuit court panel, without further analysis, affirmed the district court’s judgment regarding liability for retaliation. UTSW appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court held that the appropriate standard of proof in retaliation cases was the narrower “but for” causation standard. On June 24, 2013 the Court ruled 5 to 4 to vacate the decision of the Fifth Circuit finding it was appropriate to use “but for” causation, and not mixed motive causation, in Title VII retaliation cases. This ruling benefits employers and was contrary to the position argued by the AAUP in an amicus brief. The American Council on Education (ACE) filed an amicus brief in support of UTSW arguing that AAUP policies supported the higher burden of proof. The AAUP filed an amicus brief in response, arguing that ACE had misinterpreted AAUP policies and that in fact AAUP policies supported the but for standard in retaliation cases. The Court did not reach the issue of whether there a different standard should be applied to faculty members based on AAUP policies. That said, it is a relatively modest change in the burden of proof in such cases. In addition, the Court did not take the invitation from some amicus briefs to find that all similarly worded statutes would be interpreted in the same fashion. Such a ruling would have constituted a major change for legal claims under other statutes, such as the NLRA or the FLSA.

C. Supervisor Liability Under Title VII

Vance v. Ball State University, 520 U.S. ___, 133 S. Ct. 2434 (2013).

In Vance v. Ball State the Supreme Court addressed a claim of harassment brought by a cafeteria worker against another employee. The issue in Vance was whether the employee engaging in the harassment was a supervisor or a co-worker. Generally, an employer is accountable under Title VII when one of its supervisors harasses an employee. However, if the harasser was only a co-worker, the employer would be liable only if it was negligent in failing to prevent the harassment.

The case began when Maetta Vance, an African-American woman, sued her employer, Ball State University (BSU) alleging that a fellow employee, Saundra Davis, created a racially hostile work environment in violation of Title VII. During the time in question, Vance was employed as a catering assistant in the University Banquet and Catering division and Davis, a white woman, was employed as a catering specialist. The parties vigorously disputed the precise nature and scope of Davis' duties, but they agreed that Davis did not have the power to hire, fire, demote, promote, transfer, or discipline Vance. Vance's workplace strife persisted despite BSU's at-tempsts to address the problem. As a result, Vance filed suit claiming that Davis was her supervisor and that BSU was liable for Davis' creation of a racially hostile work environment in violation of Title VII.

The district court ruled against Vance explaining that BSU could not be held vicariously liable for Davis' alleged racial harassment because Davis could not "hire, fire, demote, promote, transfer, or discipline" Vance and, as a result, was not Vance's supervisor. The Seventh Circuit affirmed. 646 F.3d 461. It explained that, under its settled precedent, supervisor status requires "the power to hire, fire, demote, promote, transfer, or discipline an employee." Id., at 470. The court concluded that Davis was not Vance's supervisor and thus that Vance could not recover from BSU unless she could prove negligence. Finding that BSU was not negligent with respect to Davis' conduct, the court affirmed.

The Supreme Court upheld the lower court decisions. In so doing, the Court adopted a relatively narrow definition of supervisor, finding that that because the alleged harasser did not have the power to make certain formal employment decisions, such as hiring, firing, or promoting, she was not a “supervisor” under Title VII, even though she did direct Ms. Vance’s day-to-day activities. Notably the Court’s narrow definition does not apply when there is a tangible employment action such as a termination or a demotion.

VII. Intellectual Property
   A. Patent and Copyright Cases

   This case arose when professors at Georgia State University (GSU) engaged in the copying and distribution of excerpts of copyrighted academic works through GSU’s course management system for use in their courses. In April 2008 Cambridge University Press, Oxford University Press, and Sage Publishers (the Publishers) filed a copyright infringement action challenging these uses. Among the affirmative defenses that GSU asserted in their Answer was that any copying of the material was a fair use.

   During the course of the case, more than twenty professors were accused of infringement and deposed to justify their use of electronic reserves. In September 2010, the court directed that the Publishers prove “a sufficient number of instances of infringement of Plaintiffs’ copyrights to show such ongoing and continuous misuse.” In May 2012, the district court issued a 350-page decision. It found only 74 claimed uses from 64 of Plaintiffs’ works even potentially infringing, and applied its conception of fair-use principles to these claims. The district court held that nearly all of the uses in question were fair use, and non-infringing, as GSU faculty used modest amounts of the texts in question for non-profit educational purposes. Ultimately the court found that the publisher’s had proven only five infringements and even these were “caused” by the 2009 Policy’s failure to limit copying to “decidedly small excerpts” (as defined by the court); to prohibit the use of multiple chapters from the same book; or to “provide sufficient guidance in determining the ‘actual or potential effect on the market or the value for the copyrighted work.’

In August 2012, the court issued an order providing for declaratory and injunctive relief, essentially limited to ordering GSU to “maintain copyright policies for Georgia State University which are not inconsistent” with the court’s previous orders. The court also held that the GSU was the “prevailing party” under 17 U.S.C. § 505 because they “prevailed on all but five of the 99 copyright claims which were at issue” when the trial began. This conclusion led the court to find that GSU were entitled to reasonable attorneys’ fees and costs because the Publishers’ “failure to narrow their individual infringement claims significantly increased the cost of defending the suit.” In September 2012, the district court awarded the GSU $2,861,348.71 in attorneys’ fees and $85,746.39 in costs and entered a final judgment that also incorporated its prior rulings on the merits.

The Publishers filed an appeal to the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In April 2013 the AAUP submitted an amicus brief in support of GSU. The AAUP urged the Court to affirm the district court’s judgment, but also to clarify that district courts assessing fair use claims may alternatively conduct a transformative use analysis to determine whether the use was fair. A transformative use analysis compares the purpose for which the professors use copyrighted material in their teaching with the original purpose for which the work was intended. The brief explained that in cases where the materials encompass more than a modest excerpt, the use may nonetheless be transformative, and the failure to consider whether the use was transformative would burden or restrict countless highly expressive uses that have long been an essential teaching tool. No decision has yet been issued by the Eleventh Circuit.

Author’s Guild, Inc. v. HathiTrust, 902 F. Supp. 2d 445 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

In October 2012, the U.S. district court for the Southern District of New York ruled that various universities (collectively referred to as “HathiTrust”) did not violate the Copyright Act of 1976 when they digitally reproduced books, owned by the universities’ respective libraries, for the purpose of aiding print-disabled students.

HathiTrust, a collection of universities including the University of Michigan, the University of California, the University of Wisconsin, Indiana University, and Cornell University, has agreements with Google, Inc. that permits “Google to create digital copies of works in the Universities’ libraries in exchange for which Google provides digital copies to [HathiTrust].” HathiTrust stores the digital copies of the works in the HathiTrust Digital Library (HDL), which is used by its member institutions in three ways: for “(1) full-text searches; (2) preservation; and (3) access for people with certified print disabilities.” (There is no indication from the court’s opinion that digital copies in the HDL are used outside of the library setting for purposes other than those enumerated.) The full-text search function allows users to conduct term-based searches across all the works in the HDL; however, where works are not in the public domain or have not been authorized for use by the copyright owner, the term-based search only indicates the page number on which the term appears. Digital preservation of the works in the HDL helps member universities “preserve their collections in the face of normal deterioration during circulation, natural disasters, or other catastrophes.” Finally, the function providing access to print-disabled individuals, or individuals with visual disabilities, allows disabled “students to navigate [materials] . . . just as a sighted person would.”

The plaintiffs asserted that HathiTrust’s digital reproduction of the universities’ works constituted copyright infringement. The U.S. district court for the Southern District of New York, however, disagreed with this assertion. While acknowledging that the plaintiffs had established a prima facie case of copyright infringement, the court found that HathiTrust successfully defended its right to use the works under the fair use exception outlined in the Copyright Act. Weighing four factors relevant to evaluating a claim of fair use—namely, (i) the purpose and character of the use of the works, (ii) the nature of the copyrighted works, (iii) the amount of the work copied, and (iv) the impact on the market for or value of the works—the court held that the uses of the works in the HDL constituted fair use and, thus, did not constitute copyright infringement. The court weighed heavily the fact that the digital reproduction of the works was for educational purposes, noting that “[w]here the purpose of the use is for scholarship and research . . . [the evaluation] ‘tilts in the defendant’s favor.’” Further, the court acknowledged that a subset of the HDL’s collection—“previously published non-dramatic literary works”—were specifically protected by the Chafee Amendment to the Copyright Act. The Chafee Amendment, when read in conjunction with the Americans with Disabilities Act, requires educational institutions to make such works available in special formats for persons with disabilities.

The Authors have appealed and the case is now pending before the Second Circuit Court of Appeals.

In September 2012, the U.S. district court for the District of Puerto Rico held that the University of Puerto Rico (the University) did not violate the Copyright Act of 1976 when it adopted and implemented, without permission, a proposal drafted “during non-working hours” by two of its employees.

Two employees of the University, Professor José Molinelli-Freytes and program director Lillian Bird-Canals, drafted a proposal for a new graduate program in the University’s department of Environmental Sciences. The University and the employees disagree whether Molinelli-Freytes and Bird-Canals drafted the proposal pursuant to “any express assignment or instruction from [the University].” In any event, after working on the proposal for six years, Molinelli-Freytes and Bird-Canals ultimately met with university officials to “start the approval process” for their proposal, and the employees participated in many subsequent stages of the approval process. In the midst of this process, however, the employees obtained a Copyright Office registration for the proposal and requested that the University “stop using or following the proposal.” The employees initiated an administrative proceeding to enforce their copyright claims. The hearing officer recommended the dismissal of the employees’ claims, and, on appeal, the University’s Office of the President adopted the hearing officer’s recommendation. In 2011, the University implemented the proposed graduate program.

The employees appealed the results of the University’s administrative hearing to the district court, claiming, interalia, copyright infringement under the Copyright Act. Defendants, including the University and the Puerto Rico Council for Higher Education, moved to dismiss these claims on summary judgment. Noting that the employees’ proposal “was within the scope of [their] employment” with the University, the court found that the work-for-hire doctrine applied to the proposal and “vest[ed] copyright in [the University].” Additionally, the court determined that the University’s stated intellectual property policy did not supersede the work-for-hire doctrine, noting that “in work for hire situations, a written instrument signed by both parties is required to create a valid transfer.” As the University’s intellectual property policy lacked the signatures of both a representative of the University and the plaintiff—employees, the policy did not transfer copyright to the employees—even if the University caused “faculty to trust that they own the copyrights to their academic work regardless of scope of employment.” The district court granted the University’s motion for summary judgment and dismissed the employees’ claims.

Theresa Cameron was a tenured associate professor at Arizona State University. She was accused of misconduct by the Dean and Associate Dean for, among other things, allegedly plagiarizing syllabi of other faculty in the construction and use of several of her own course syllabi. The Dean, Associate Dean, and Provost asked the university President to terminate Dr. Cameron for “just cause” under University and Board of Regents policies, and he did so. Professor Cameron appealed her termination to the ASU Faculty Senate, Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure (“CAFT”) which found that even though Dr. Cameron admitted she had plagiarized her syllabi, CAFT unanimously recommended that she be reinstated and undergo a post-tenure review to assist her with construction and use of syllabi. The university President, however, rejected CAFT’s recommendation, and Dr. Cameron filed suit. Both the trial and appellate court ruled in favor of the University and Professor Cameron has filed a petition for review by the Arizona Supreme Court.

AAUP’ filed an amicus brief in support of Dr. Cameron’s petition for review, drafted by Arizona State University law professors Joseph Feller and Paul Bender and joined by fifteen ASU law school faculty. The brief primarily argued that the sanction of dismissal was grossly disproportionate to a finding that Dr. Cameron copied portions of syllabi from other sources without attribution and therefore deprived Dr. Cameron of her position without proper due process.

The Arizona Supreme Court issued an order on October 30, 2012, denying Professor Cameron’s petition for review.

VIII. Union/Collective Bargaining Cases and Issues
A. NLRB Guidance/Cases of Interest

Noel Canning v. NLRB, 705 F.3d 490 (2013).

In January 2013, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found invalid three recess appointments that President Obama made to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) early the previous year. As the recess appointments were “invalid from their inception,” the court found that the NLRB lacked the requisite quorum to issue a decision in this case and vacated the NLRB’s decision.

To render decisions, the NLRB must have a quorum of at least three Board members. On January 4, 2012, following the expiration of a Board member’s term the previous day, President Obama appointed three new Board members to the NLRB to ensure that the Board could reach this requisite quorum and, in effect, avoid a shutdown of the NLRB. The President appointed Board members Block, Griffin, and Flynn using the Recess Appointments Clause of the Constitution.

In this particular case, Noel Canning, a Pepsi-Cola bottler and distributor from Washington state, appealed an adverse NLRB decision, dated February 8, 2012, to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Arguing that President Obama’s appointment of members Block, Griffin, and Flynn was unconstitutional, Noel Canning contended that the NLRB’s decision in its case was invalid because the Board lacked the quorum required to render a decision. The circuit court agreed and ultimately ruled President Obama’s recess appointments invalid, vacating the NLRB’s decision. To reach this conclusion, the circuit court closely scrutinized the meaning of the phrase “the Recess” in the Recess Appointments Clause of the Constitution and relied heavily on “logic and language . . . [and] also constitutional history” to decipher the term. Concluding that “the Recess” refers only to recesses between sessions of the Senate—periods “when the Senate simply cannot provide advice and consent”—rather than mere intrasession breaks, the court ruled that President Obama impermissibly utilized the Recess Appointments Clause to appoint members Block, Griffin, and Flynn. Because it ruled President Obama’s appointments invalid, the court vacated the NLRB’s decision in this case.

This case signifies that all NLRB rulings issued after President Obama’s January 2012 appointment of members Block, Griffin, and Flynn (over 200 decision in total) may be invalid. However, despite the circuit court’s decision, the NLRB has continued business as usual. While the circuit court’s decision in this case is only binding for the District of Columbia circuit, similar challenges are pending in other circuits.

In June of 2013, the U.S. Supreme Court accepted an appeal by the NLRB and the case will be heard in the 2013-2014 term.

Point Park University v. Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh/Communication Workers of America Local 38061, AFL-CIO, CLC, N.L.R.B. Case No.: 06-RC-012276 (Private Institute Faculty Organizing).

In May 2012, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) invited briefs from interested parties on the question of whether university faculty members seeking to be represented by a union are employees covered by the National Labor Relations Act or excluded managers. Point Park University faculty members petitioned for an election and voted in favor of representation by the Communications Workers of America, Local 38061. However, the university challenged the decision to hold the election, claiming that the faculty members were managers and therefore ineligible for union representation.

AAUP submitted an amicus brief in July 2012, urging the NLRB to develop a legal definition of employee status “in a manner that accurately reflects employment relationships in universities and colleges and that respects the rights of college and university employees to exercise their rights to organize and engage in collective bargaining.”

AAUP’s brief stressed the extent to which the erosion of faculty power that union advocates at Point Park have cited reflects broad trends. “The application of a corporate model of management has resulted in significant changes in university institutional structure and distribution of authority. There has been a major expansion of the administrative hierarchy, which exercises greater unilateral authority over academic affairs,” the brief states. AAUP also points out that, “This organizational structure stands in stark contrast to the Yeshiva majority’s description of the university as a collegial institution primarily driven by the internal decision-making authority of its faculty. Further, university administrators increasingly are making decisions in response to external market concerns, rather than consulting with, relying on, or following faculty recommendations. Thus, university decision-making is increasingly made unilaterally by high-level administrators who are driven by external market factors in setting and implementing policy on such issues as program development or discontinuance, student admissions, tuition hikes, and university-industry relationships. As a result, the faculty have experienced a continually shrinking scope of influence over academic matters.”

In addition to AAUP’s brief, amicus briefs were filed by Matthew Finkin, Joel Cutcher-Gershenfeld, and Thomas A. Kochan (as impartial employment and labor relations scholars); Dr. Michael Hoerger, PhD, social scientist; Higher Education Council of the Employment Law Alliance; National Education Association; Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh, CWA, AFL-CIO, and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations; American Council on Education, National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, Council of Independent Colleges, Association of Independent Colleges and Universities of Pennsylvania, College and University Professional Association for Human Resources, and Association of American Universities; The Center for the Analysis of Small Business Labor Policy, Inc.; Louis Benedict, MBA, J.D., Ph.D. (Higher Education Administrator); and National Right to Work Legal Defense and Education Foundation, Inc.³

B. Graduate Assistants Right to Organize

New York University v. GSOC/UAW, N.L.R.B. Case No.: 02-RC-023481; Polytechnic Institute of New York University v. International Union, United Automobile Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), N.L.R.B. Case No.: 29-RC-012054.

In June 2012, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) invited briefs from interested parties on the question of whether graduate student assistants may be statutory employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the National Labor Relations Act. The NLRB specifically invited parties to address whether the NLRB should modify or overrule its decision in Brown University, 342 NLRB 483 (2004), which held that graduate student assistants are not statutory employees because they “have a primarily educational, not economic, relationship with their university,” and whether, if the NLRB finds that graduate student assistants may be statutory employees, should the Board continue to find that graduate student assistants engaged in research funded by external grants are not statutory employees, in part because they do not

³ Point Park University v. Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh/ Communication Workers of America Local 38061, AFL-CIO, CLC, NLRB Case No.: 06-RC-012276 http://www.nlrb.gov/case/06-RC-012276 (last accessed 7/23/2012)

AAUP co-signed with the AFL-CIO, AFT, and NEA, on an amicus brief which was filed on July 23, 2012, and argues that the NLRB should overrule Brown University and return to its prior determination that graduate student assistants who “must perform work, controlled by the Employer, and in exchange for consideration” are statutory employees, “notwithstanding that they are simultaneously enrolled as students.” The brief also counters the argument raised in Brown that permitting graduate student assistants to collectively bargain will “be detrimental to the educational process,” pointing out that graduate student assistants at public universities have often engaged in collective bargaining without such detriment. In fact, the brief, argues, Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act would “virtually certain[ly] ... be construed to ‘limit bargaining subjects for ... academic employees’ by ‘excluding, from collective bargaining, admission requirements for students, conditions for awarding degrees, and content and supervision of courses, curricula, and research programs.’” The NLRB, the brief admonishes, is charged with “encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining” and protecting workers’ rights in organizing and negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment; it “has not been assigned the task of determining whether collective bargaining should be encouraged according to the agency’s views of sound educational policy.”

On the issue of whether the NLRB should continue to find that graduate student assistants engaged in research funded by external grants are not statutory employees, the brief distinguishes graduate students pursuing their own studies supported by external financial assistance from graduate students performing research duties to further a professor’s externally funded research. The former are not performing a “service to the University and thus [would] not [be] employees of the University.” The latter, however, are “no different from other university employees, such as the principal investigator, lab techs, and clericals, who are working on the same project,” and the source of funding used to pay their wages, “is not relative to, much less determinative of, employee status.” The brief also argues that there is no difference between graduate student assistants “assist[ing] on externally funded research projects of their university in return for compensation” from graduate student assistants “employed by a foundation” “established [by their university] to manage its research awards.”

Additional amicus briefs have been filed by Michael Hoerger, PhD, Senior Instructor, University of Rochester Medical Center; United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) and UE Local 896/ Campaign to Organize Graduate Students (COGS); Adrienne Eaton, Department Chair and Professor of Labor Studies and Employment Relations at Rutgers University; James O’Kelly, law student at Rutgers School of Law-Newark; Higher Education Council of the Employment Law Alliance; Unite Here and Graduate Employees & Students Organization; American Council on Education, Association of American Medical Colleges, Association of American Universities, College and University Professional Association for Human
C. Agency Fee

Knox v. SEIU Local 1000, 132 S. Ct. 2277 (2012).

In June 2012, the Supreme Court held that public-sector unions, seeking to collect either a mid-year fee increase or a special assessment, are required to issue a fresh “Hudson notice” to nonmembers at the time of the fee request; further, the Court held that after such notice is given, unions can only collect funds from those nonmembers who affirmatively choose to pay the requested fees. This decision reversed an earlier decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and may have implications for all public-sector unions operating under “agency shop” arrangements, which permit a union to represent all employees (union members and nonmembers alike) in a unionized workplace and collect annual agency fees from the nonmembers to cover the cost of the union’s services.

At issue in this case was whether the Service Employees International Union Local 1000 (SEIU Local 1000), the bargaining agent for California state employees, was required to provide a separate Hudson notice after it imposed a temporary, mid-year fee increase to be used for political purposes. More specifically, SEIU Local 1000 levied a special assessment to mount campaigns to defeat two measures on a November 2005 ballot but did not issue a second agency fee notice for the year. Agency fee payers challenged the special assessment, arguing that it violated their First Amendment rights under the U.S. Constitution because it seized their money for non-chargeable political expenses. The district court denied the plaintiffs’ motion for a preliminary injunction against the union but ruled that the union must give the agency fee payers a chance to ask for a refund on the special dues. SEIU Local 1000 appealed the district court’s decision, and the Ninth Circuit overturned the lower court’s decision, holding that the union’s notice complied with the procedural requirements for agency fee notices set out in the seminal case Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson.

The Supreme Court ultimately overturned the Ninth Circuit’s ruling, however, and held that, “when a public-sector union imposes a special assessment or dues increase, the union must provide a fresh Hudson notice and may not exact any funds from nonmembers without their affirmative consent.” Contrasting the lower court’s holding, the Supreme Court found that the Hudson precedent is not dispositive in the current case, explaining that the Hudson requirements only concern a union’s “regular annual fees,” while the plaintiffs in the current case were objecting to “a special assessment or dues increase . . . levied to meet expenses that were not disclosed when the amount of the regular assessment was set.” Because SEIU Local 1000’s special assessment was requested after the union established its annual fee, the union was obligated to send a new Hudson notice with the special assessment to ensure that nonmembers could make “informed choice[s]” about paying the additional fees. Further, to “respect the limits of the First Amendment,” the Court stated that the fresh Hudson notice would only allow SEIU Local 1000 to collect the special assessment if the nonmembers “opt into the special fee.”

In dicta, Justice Alito indicated that the Court’s former decisions (such as Hudson), which authorize agency shops to collect union fees from nonmembers, may in fact violate nonmembers’ First Amendment rights by compelling nonmembers to fund speech with which they may disagree. Noting that the Court’s earlier cases have “tolerated” this potential impingement upon First Amendment rights, however, Justice Alito declined to render a decision on the overall constitutionality of agency shops. Commentators, however, have reported that this language could signal “[C]ourt approval of a . . . union-weakening, so-called ‘right to work’ law.”

Commentators have argued that this language “all but begs” opponents of organized labor to use the Court’s emerging First Amendment jurisprudence to challenge the validity of agency shops altogether. Indeed, on January 9, 2013, five Alaska State Troopers, with the help of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, Inc., filed a federal lawsuit seeking to expand the rights expounded upon in this case. Specifically, the plaintiffs challenge the method their agency shop uses to collect nonmember agency fees: a structure which requires nonmembers to opt out of, rather than opt into, the payment of special assessment fees. The case has not yet gone to trial but will undoubtedly provide insight into the meaning of the Supreme Court’s Knox statements about the general constitutionality of agency shops.